Excerpt: . . . in which the capitalists wealth may be invested--perhaps to proceed to personal outrage, and attack, on some fancied injury, even his life. The Irish farmer in many districts dare not adopt turnip husbandry; the starving peasantry would clear off his crop for their own consumption. He will not venture to plant; his trees would disappear as soon as they are fit for fuel. He must not fence his enclosures: the fences would be levelled by the first vagrant he sent unrelieved off his premises. If he lays out his stock in cattle, they are perhaps houghed from a similar motive. If he lays down a field to pasture, it is turned up by a hundred spades during the night; and he is commanded by Capt. Rock, under pain of death, to let it out in potato-patches! How is capital to grow in such an atmosphere Who would invest capital in such a country that had the choice of another And how is a better state of things to be expected, so long as thousands are in want of food, and denied the means of obtaining a livelihood by honest industry In one word, it is the absence of employment for the population of Ireland which keeps them miserable and disorganized. And it is the misery and disorganization thus produced which prevents the investment of capital in the employment of the population. Here then is a train of unhappy circumstances acting on each other alternately,...
